

Jaylen Rios A.

Mrs. Rangel

ERWC - Period 6

11/19/25

Should Juvenile Be Tried as Adults?

If a minor murdered someone and they are the age of 14, they should 100% without a doubt be tried as an adult. I know it sounds crazy, and you may think, "But they're so young! Their minds aren't properly developed yet!" But just think for one moment. Whenever a juvenile is in the process of either being charged as a minor or as an adult, the main crime committed is murder, and planned murder at that. Every murder crime ever committed by minors is always planned. We all were once a teenager obviously, but we know better than to commit such vicious and violent crimes. Every teenager knows the difference between right and wrong. The main reasons some teens commit murder are their parents raised them, their environment, being provoked, abuse, etc. But just because they are dealing with their personal life doesn't make it an acceptance to simply let the boy/girl be free all because they are "Young and struggling." In the article "On Punishment and Teen Killers," by Jennifer Jenkins, she talked about the boy who had killed her sister, her sister's husband and their unborn baby. In paragraph 2 she said, "She begged for the life of her unborn child as he shot her. He reported to a friend, who testified at his trial about his "thrill kill". She also explained the boy wanted to "see what it would feel like to shoot someone." And yet so many people defended him, primarily his family. Planned murder is still murder. No matter the age. No one knows exactly how it feels to be the victim's family and how they feel listening to other people saying that a boy/girl shouldn't be tried as adults all because they aren't 18 yet. In the article "Juvenile Injustice: Charging Youth as Adults Is Ineffective..." Paragraph 10 they mention how "When we lock up young people, they are more likely to be exposed to extreme violence, fall prey to abuse, and suffer from illness." But I disagree. I feel as though the moment even one moment of violence is shown to them, they know they are already exposed to it. Around 45% of teen killers are exposed to serious incidents of household violence. And around 90% report some exposed to abuse and violence throughout their childhood. Also, they mention things of color, which is rather irrelevant when it comes to the topic. They mention how "youth of color receive harsher sentences than white youth charged with similar offenses." Yes, it is rather disappointing knowing that there can be some people who are rather rude to people of color, but what's worse is if it's the judge. But there are so many murder cases that end up being discovered as a planned murder or attempted murder. Now then, let us imagine this; we'll use a few fake names in this scenario. Sakura's family are victims of losing their teen to another teen named Evan. And let's say Evan's family say "he's too young to be tried as an adult." But the following week, Evan gets murdered by a teen named Shirley. Evan's family would soon quickly change their minds the moment that their teen ends up dead. They would say that Shirley should be tried as an adult for murdering their teen yet completely forget about Sakura's family. Loads of people change their minds the moment that the same bad thing that happened to someone else happens to them. Which is a main problem, loads of people seem to forget about the victims family and how they feel having to hear that the person who murdered their teen doesn't deserve to be tried as an adult all because of many people thinking that 13-16 is "too young." But in all seriousness, I agree with the people who believe we should try teens as adults. If they are younger than 13, than that would depend on the crime that the child has committed.